But I notice some problems when run on iOS 10 devices. For example: On viewDidLoad() If there is no constraint (in this case, the height of the tableView is 0), it will show a pop up message "Constraints are not satisfied" if I did not added a constraint. But, if I added some constraints that has height of 0 or equal height to the superview, it will work fine. How do I avoid the pop up message? A: Like you said the error message happened because the height of the view of you are setting to 0 isn't respected with the constraint. You have to set 0 to the constraint that must be that way or update the constraint in such way, as the view got the correct height however, if you are using auto layout it's better to set a 0 Height in the Storyboard or a Code to prevent this kind of problem or you can set a size 0 to the constraint As you can see, in the top right you can see the result with the height: 0 in constraints and in the bottom the result with the size: 0 in constraints you can read more about this in WWDC Session - What's new in Interface Builder and Auto Layout An immunohistochemical study of tenascin in human carcinoma of the breast
